

DNA methylation levels are age-dependent and can vary over time. When an individual's DNA methylation age is greater than the actual age, this means that the individual is in an age acceleration state, and which may be associated with many aging manifestations, disease development, and even death.